FOREWORD

The world of poultry has been fortunate to be served by the written word from many sources over a long span of time. The domestication of various kinds of poultry began over 5,000 years ago. Since that time many observations have been recorded and theories advanced as to how to make these birds be of greater service to man. The earliest writer generally credited with accurate accounts of poultry husbandry was Marcus Cato (234-145 B.C.). Lucius Columella, writing at about the time of Christ, gave detailed accounts of the management of various fowls and suggestions for improving productivity. Rutilius Palladius, writing in the fourth century A.D., commented on the husbandry of many kinds of birds but gave only a very brief account of chickens, stating, "There is no housewife who does not know how to rear chickens."

From that time to the present more than 7,000 bound volumes have been written about the domesticated birds we know as poultry. In addition, more than 2,000 periodicals have addressed the various facets of poultry and those who benefit from it.

Chickens first served man as a role model (courage, alertness, and family-oriented defense). The ability of the chicken to adapt to a variety of circumstances enabled it to become an integral part of man's society as new lands were colonized and agricultural systems changed.

Poultry journalism first addressed itself to the management of fowls for their survival in captive situations. It was recognized early on that the link between survival and benefit to man was a solid one. Thus much of what has been written about poultry throughout the ages has been both descriptive and suggestive.

Ulisse Aldrovandi, writing in the 16th century, gave us very complete descriptions of the various physical features of chickens that we use today to identify breeds. These characteristics became the basis for early selection and eventually were some of the "marks" used by geneticists to create the modern strains in use commercially today.

Journalism first addressed poultry as a part of an overall farm or agricultural undertaking. It also recognized that in many cases the farmwife and the children would be heavily involved in the care of poultry. Many periodicals that catered all or in part to poultry also carried columns or sections addressed to the ladies. Articles prepared by female writers were popular. This continued until a high percentage of commercial poultry production was no longer based on general farms.

In the closing years of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th, the commercial value of poultry became evident. Specialized poultry farms became commonplace, and poultry publications also recognized that the fancier and the farm flock were no longer the focus of the industry. The poultry press offered first a service and later a means of coordinating the industry. Industry organizations were formed within the various specialties of production, marketing, and processing. Periodicals and reports of markets and storage levels became the basis for business decisions. Market forecasts, growers' intentions, and reports of competitive performance of the birds themselves formed the base upon which credit was extended and employees trained. Research reports and scientific studies gained the attention of professional managers as the printed word became as specialized as the industry itself.

The economics of scale gave rise to vertical integration, and marketing decisions were based on consumer preferences, product image, and competition from other products. All of this has put great emphasis on accurate, concise, and timely information.

Poultry periodicals (refereed journals, the popular press, in-house newsletters, and government reports) have all played a vital role. Those that we have saved from the past give us a better understanding of the conditions that prevailed and the emphasis that was present at their time of issue. So much has been written and so little saved that it is vitally important that existing resources be identified for use by future generations in order that today's discoveries be real progress and not just the uncovering of something previously done but whose records were not preserved.

INTRODUCTION

The project to compile the World List of Poultry Serials was begun with a generous gift from the American Poultry Historical Society to the National Agricultural Library, to make accessible in one place the variety of serial literature on poultry science and poultry products. Among the sources used to find bibliographic data for these titles were: online databases, printed bibliographies, the National Agricultural Library collection, and specialized lists. The titles selected were chosen for their coverage of poultry topics. If there were words in the title or issuing agency related to poultry or if they were found on specialized lists of poultry titles, they were selected for the list. We have attempted to list every poultry title for which we were able to find some bibliographic information.

It is in the nature of serials to change their titles, merge with other serials, and split away again. Every time a title changes, a new cataloging record is necessary according to the Anglo-American Cataloging Rules, 2nd edition, which is the basic tool for library cataloging in English-speaking countries. There is one publication in the list that has changed titles 10 times. Thus there are no fewer than 11 citations for that publication in this compilation; an original record and 10 records that resulted from title changes.

The NAL collection contains nearly two-thirds of the titles listed; however, there are gaps in the holdings of some titles. It is hoped that the list will be used as a finding aid to fill in NAL's holdings, and to develop as complete a collection of poultry serials as possible. Any donations of materials will be greatly appreciated and can be sent to: World List of Poultry Serials, Gift and Exchange Unit, Room 002, National Agricultural Library, Beltsville, MD 20705. We would also be pleased to hear about any corrections or additions of titles to the list.

There are many people who have contributed their time and effort toward the completion of the World List of Poultry Serials. Rose Broome of NAL's Information Systems Division provided the computer support on the Alpha Micro/STAR system. Her expertise was responsible for the difficult tasks of collating, sorting, and typesetting the list. Stan Kosecki spent many months identifying poultry titles, and inputting them into the database. I also want to thank Idalia Acosta and Sarah Thomas for their support during this project, and give special thanks to John L. Skinner for his contribution of additional titles to the list and for his gracious offer to write a foreword.

USERS GUIDE

Each record is identified by an accession number (A) (see diagram to identify specific fields). The body of the record begins with a title (B), which is often qualified by place of publication (C), date, or corporate body to distinguish between similar titles. If known, the beginning and/or ending volumes or dates (D) are given, followed by other corporate bodies (E) associated with the record and alternate titles (F). The city of publication (G) and publisher (H) is given after the word 'Published:' with earlier (I) and later (J) titles following if applicable.

The second paragraph of each record contains the language of the text (K), the place of publication (L), the frequency (M), and, if known, the International Standard Serial Number (ISSN) (N). The place of publication will show provinces and territories of Canada, republics of the Soviet Union, divisions of the United Kingdom, and States of the United States. All other places are designated by the name of the country. If the publication is in NAL, then the NAL call number (O) and holdings (P) are given.
